Non, obs form of None, Noon, Nun

Non- (nɒn), prefix (also 4–6 noun-, noon-, 5 nom-, 5–6 nowne-, 5–7 none-, often written separate), used to express negation. The earlier formations were either directly adopted from, or modelled upon, Anglo-French compounds in noun- = OF. non-, nom-, nun-, num- (mod F non-):—L nōn 'not' used as a prefix, from about 1500 the predominant form of the prefix is that of the L. nōn. It appears first in English towards the end of the 14th c. in non-power (Chaucer, Langland, Wyclif), and non-residence, nonsuit (Wyclif). In the 15th and 16th c. a considerable number of compounds (chiefly nouns of action and gerunds) were in use, most of them being of a legal character Until about the middle of the 17th c the compounds formed with non- are mostly of a special or technical kind, but from that time the prefix became less restricted in its use and began to be prefixed freely to substantives, adjectives and adverbs, participles, and verbal sbs. (rarely to infinitival forms). To the political and religious movements of the 17th and 18th c. are due many new formations, some of which, as nonconformist, non-juror, non-resistance, have a permanent place in the language

In the majority of the compounds of non- the hyphen is usually retained; but it is commonly omitted in the case of a few, such as nonconformist, nonentity, nonsense, in which the etymology has been to some extent lost sight of. Normally the prefix is unstressed, but in the disyllables nonage, nonclaim, nonsense, nonsuit, and in nonchalance, -ant, nondescript, the non- receives the stress It is also liable to be stressed when the compound and the simple word are coupled together, as to act or no n-act, distribution or no n-distribution, being and no n-being.

Formations having an independent status or a continuous history during any period are entered as Main words, a small proportion of the remainder are illustrated in this article, no attempt having been made to represent with any degree of fullness the very extensive development in the use of the prefix during the last hundred years.
